Research in Progress

"A Re-examination of the Decision Making Process in Whistleblowing Behavior." (Journal of Business Ethics, R&R Received on February 10, 2023).

While existing literature has identified many of the factors that influence individual behavior when it comes to reporting corporate fraud, most models ignore or undervalue the role that self-driven motivation plays in the decision making process. Applying recent findings in the donation literature to the field of accounting, we propose to show that while the common conception is that whistleblower's are altruistic individuals, the ultimate decision is more strongly driven by self-motivated emotions and attitudes.

"Framework to Map the Impact of Aspergers & Narcissism on Auditor Outcomes (Dr. Robert Marley & Dr. Allison Beck)" (Planning).

Exploratory research to create a framework of the impact of Aspergers and Narcissism on accountants' work output.

"Inadvisability of Metaphorically Conceptualizing Students as Customers" (Planning).

Students are often conceptualized as customers, but students are not customers in the traditional sense, so common use of this conceptual metaphor has incited considerable controversy. This project will deconstruct the 'students as customers' metaphor habitually engaged by administrators and faculty as a cognitive frame for institutional thought, rationale, and policy re university students. The paper will explore the terms of the "students as customers" metaphor, investigate real-world examples, examine controversy surrounding use of the metaphor, analyze implications for institutional policy, and offer alternative (defamiliarizing) conceptualizations for students.

The project has broad appeal/relevance and represents potential for publication in applied/application, learning/pedagogical, and/or basic/discovery journals. Preliminary literature review and tentative paper outline currently in progress. This project is in the planning stage.

"Private Company Auditor Responsiveness to New Accounting Standards (Dr. Steve Platau, Dr. Robert Marley, & Professor Rob Goodwin)" (Writing Results).

"The Effects of Expanded Analyst Ownership Disclosure on Nonprofessional Investors' Judgments and Decision-Making (Dr. Robert Marley & Dr. Mark Mellon)" (On-Going). This study examines the effects of expanded analyst ownership disclosures on nonprofessional investors' confidence in analyst recommendations and on their subsequent capital allocation decisions. In an experimental setting, nonprofessional investors received an analyst investment recommendation that contained a disclosure with information regarding the magnitude and duration of the analyst's ownership position in the recommended stock. Applying attribution theory's discounting principle, we find evidence of an interactive effect on investor judgment such that investors who receive a disclosure that the analyst holds a large, short-term investment position were less confident in the recommendation relative to investors who receive alternative disclosures, including the disclosure currently required by Title V. Further, we predict and find mediated-moderation such that disclosures affect investors' confidence in an analyst's recommendation, subsequently affecting the amount invested. In sum, the evidence suggests that investors find analyst ownership disclosures informative. Implications for market regulators and practitioners are discussed.

"Two Archetype Faces Used by a Successful Narcissistic Leader (Dr. Robert Marley, Dr. Heidi Montague, & Dr. Doreen MacAulay)" (Writing Results). Using case analysis, this study examines the effects of a successful narcissist leader's actions on his employees in a business context. Two archetypal masks are identified: the Magician and the Autocrat. Then, a discussion of how the leader wears each mask to accomplish a different purpose is presented.

"Unintended Consequences of Multiple Layers of Audit Review in CPA Firms" (Planning). Robert Marley and I are beginning a project aimed at analyzing some unintended (adverse) consequences of the multi-stage review place that takes place on audits conducted by CPA firms.
